This weekly digest is intended to aggregate and distill key content from a broad spectrum of practice domains and organization types including key agencies/IGOs, NGOs, governments, academic and research institutions, consortiums and collaborations, foundations, and commercial organizations. We also monitor a spectrum of peer-reviewed journals and general media channels. The Sentinel's geographic scope is global/regional but selected country-level content is included. We recognize that this spectrum/scope yields an indicative and not an exhaustive product.

The Sentinel is published as a PDF, scheduled for release each weekend. The PDF is posted, and the elements of each edition are presented as a set of blog posts at <https://ge2p2-center.net/>. This blog allows full-text searching of over 6,000 entries.

Human Rights – Discrimination Against Children

Racism and discrimination against children rife in countries worldwide - UNICEF

Press release 17 November 2022

New report outlines how children are discriminated against in health, access to government resources, and education; analysis of 22 low- and middle-income countries shows advantaged groups are twice as likely to have basic reading skills

... Rights denied: The impact of discrimination on children shows the extent to which racism and discrimination impact children's education, health, access to a registered birth, and to a fair and equal justice system, and highlights widespread disparities among minority and ethnic groups.

"Exclusion and discrimination during childhood cause harm that can last a lifetime," said UNICEF Executive Director Catherine Russell. "This hurts us all. Protecting the rights of every child – whoever they are, wherever they come from – is the surest way to build a more peaceful, prosperous, and just world for everyone."

Among the new findings, the report shows that children from marginalized ethnic, language, and religious groups in an analysis of 22 low- and middle-income countries lag far behind their peers in reading skills. On average, students aged 7-14 from the most advantaged group are more than twice as likely to have foundational reading skills than those from the least advantaged group. An analysis of data on the level of children registered at birth – a prerequisite for access to basic rights – found significant disparities among children of different religious and ethnic groups...

Rights denied: The impact of discrimination on children

November 2022 :: 36 pages

Highlights

- All children everywhere have the right to a full childhood with dignity, respect and worth. The right to a childhood free from discrimination and exclusion is crucial to child well-being and accessing the services needed to survive and thrive.
- Yet racism and discrimination against children based on their nationality, ethnicity, language religion and other grounds are rife in countries across the world. Systemic and institutional racism and discrimination prevent children from accessing their rights and puts them at risk of a lifetime of deprivation.
- Rights denied: The impact of discrimination on children focuses on discrimination against children based on their ethnicity, language, religion, or nationality along with racial discrimination, based on the United Nations' definitions and categories of minorities. It provides a wide range of examples from a diverse set of countries to show how children from minority or marginalized backgrounds continue to be left behind.
- This report includes case studies on how children are combating discrimination, data on disparities for a range of critical services including education, birth registration, water and sanitation and immunization, evidence on how discrimination affects children, and results of a U-Report on discrimination with responses from over 400,000 young people.

Immunization and child mortality

A 2022 study of 64 countries found that children from minority ethnic groups faced lower immunization rates in over half of the countries. In five countries, there were gaps of 50 percentage points or more. Children in a majority ethnic group had 29 per cent lower prevalence of zero-dose compared to other ethnic groups in the study. The study also found that children belonging to the majority ethnic group in a country tended to have lower zero-dose prevalence compared with the rest of the population. Disparities found with immunization services are similar across other child health services as well.<sup>21</sup>

More than two-thirds of the 36 low- and middle-income countries studied on under-five mortality found a significant difference by ethnic group. The median mortality ratio among all countries was 3.3. Ethnic disparities are persistent. In nearly all countries studied, adjusting for wealth, education and place of residence did not affect gaps in mortality between ethnic groups.<sup>22</sup>

Democracy and Trust

OECD Ministers commit to action to strengthen trust and democracy

18/11/2022 - Ministers and high-level representatives from the 38 OECD countries, the European Union, as well as some OECD accession candidate countries, have reiterated their shared commitment to the core values of democracy and welcomed a set of actions to strengthen the resilience of democracies and increase their responsiveness to citizens' growing and changing expectations.

Ministers gathered in Luxembourg on 18 November for the OECD Public Governance Ministerial on "Building Trust and Reinforcing Democracy", under the chairmanship of Luxembourg and vice-chairmanship of Colombia, France, Lithuania, and the United States.

Low voter turnout, greater political polarisation and larger groups of citizens dissociating themselves from traditional democratic processes pose significant challenges for policy makers in many OECD countries today. Even in the most well-established democracies, these trends are testing institutions and hindering governments' ability to address pressing social and economic challenges. At the same time, major global disruptions such as the COVID-19 pandemic, Russia's war of aggression against Ukraine, and climate change, have underscored the importance of strengthening the governance of democracies and citizens' trust.

"We know that democracy is the system of government best placed to ensure inclusive, prosperous, sustainable and peaceful societies," OECD Secretary-General Mathias Cormann said. "While democratic economic and political systems have stood the test of time, as we witnessed during the pandemic, how governments respond to today's challenges and disruptions will impact citizens' trust and satisfaction over the long run. Our democratic models must evolve to increase their resilience and better deliver on citizens' expectations. The OECD is at the forefront of this effort through its Reinforcing Democracy Initiative and through the important commitments made at today's Ministerial."...

Ministers discussed action around five key governance challenges for democracy:

- :: combating mis- and disinformation;
- :: ensuring representation, participation and openness in public life;
- :: embracing the global responsibilities of government and building resilience to foreign influence;
- :: "governing green", or the capacity of democracies to respond to climate change and other environmental challenges; and
- :: transforming public governance for digital democracy.

Underpinning these discussions were the findings of the OECD Trust Survey, which identifies what drives citizens trust in public institutions. The Ministerial meeting culminated with the adoption of the Declaration on Building Trust and Reinforcing Democracy in which Ministers and high-level representatives restated their commitments and supported a range of concrete actions, including:

- A set of Action Plans on combatting mis and disinformation; participation and representation (including gender equality); and governing green and invited the OECD to develop further Action Plans on embracing the global responsibilities of government and building resilience to foreign influence and transforming public governance for digital democracy over the next 18 months.
- The launch of the OECD Global Forum on Building Trust and Reinforcing Democracy as a platform to share knowledge, assess and improve public governance to meet the challenges facing democracies going forward. The Global Forum will assess progress and drive forward action on the basis of dialogue between OECD Members, partner countries, civil society, business and other stakeholders.
- The launch of the OECD DIS/MIS Information Resource Hub, to support governments in establishing a strengthened whole-of-society approach among governments, media and civil society organisations to strengthen information integrity.
- An invitation for the OECD to carry out the OECD Survey on the Drivers of Trust in Public Institutions every two years and to leverage the results to support countries in taking concrete action to build trust and track progress over time.

The Ministerial meeting was preceded on 17 November by the OECD Global Forum on Building Trust and Reinforcing Democracy. The Global Forum brought together over 800 stakeholders from government, business, civil society, media, and academia from more than 60 countries to share perspectives on key challenges and solutions for making democracy fit for the 21st century.

Ryan J. Dwyer and Elizabeth W. Dunn

Significance

We took advantage of a unique experiment, in which anonymous donors gave US$10,000 to each of 200 recipients in seven countries. By comparing cash recipients with a control group that did not receive money, this preregistered experiment provides causal evidence that cash transfers substantially increase happiness across a diverse global sample. These gains were greatest for recipients who had the least: Those in lower-income countries gained three times more happiness than those in higher-income countries. Our data provide the clearest evidence to date that private citizens can improve net global happiness through voluntary redistribution to those with less.

Abstract

How much happiness could be gained if the world's wealth were distributed more equally? Despite decades of research investigating the relationship between money and happiness, no experimental work has quantified this effect for people across the global economic spectrum. We estimated the total gain in happiness generated when a pair of high-net-worth donors redistributed US$2 million of their wealth in $10,000 cash transfers to 200 people. Our preregistered analyses offer causal evidence that cash transfers substantially increase happiness among economically diverse individuals around the world. Recipients in lower-income countries exhibited happiness gains three times larger than those in higher-income countries. Still, the cash provided detectable benefits for people with household incomes up to $123,000.

Offline: COVID-19—the lessons that science forgot

Richard Horton

Published: November 19, 2022 DOI: https://doi.org/10.1016/S0140-6736\(22\)02358-302358-3)

[Editor's formatting/text bolding]

Remember the pandemic? Barely. Economist Impact, a policy research team within The Economist Group, supported by The Lancet's publisher Elsevier, last week launched Confidence in Research—a report exploring attitudes of scientists to the practice and communication of science during the pandemic.

Based on a survey of over 3000 researchers worldwide, Economist Impact identified important actions that should be considered if mistakes are not to be repeated during future health emergencies. What were the key findings?

Inequalities in access to resources and funding for scientists worsened, especially for early career researchers, women, and those working in lower-income settings. Misinformation was a growing concern. Scientists took on more public-facing activities, disseminating and interpreting new research findings and countering false or misleading information. Although scientists recognised that there was a welcome increase in public attention to science, that awareness was not always matched by enhanced understanding. Researchers paid more attention to communicating uncertainties and limitations in their work. Their entry into the public sphere raised concerns about the oversimplification and politicisation of research. One challenge has been the avalanche of online abuse directed at scientists. Researchers sought more support to improve their communication skills when engaging with the public and policy makers.

Economist Impact made several proposals. Campaigns to counter misinformation. Investments to build public trust in science. Commissioning more research on science communication. Enhanced research literacy among the media. More vigorous efforts to explain new research findings to a public audience. Promoting more cross-country partnerships and making room for non-English speakers to reduce inequities. And preparing scientists for more public-facing roles—reducing administrative burdens, providing mentorship for early career researchers, training in communication, hiring science communicators, and providing support to confront online abuse.

I would add five additional challenges.

First, addressing the problem of speed. The demand for instant publication of new research was intense during the COVID-19 pandemic. So intense that peer review was routinely bypassed with an explosion of preprints. While understandable and probably necessary, I have misgivings. At The Lancet we see on a daily basis the value peer review brings to improving the science we publish. Omitting peer review has a cost.

Second, solving the problem of volume. The tidal wave of research papers that COVID-19 triggered may have reflected the remarkable agility of science to pivot during a crisis, but the pandemic also revealed that science today has a curation challenge. We have not developed effective means to select, organise, and present new research in a way that optimises understanding and application.

Third, managing the problem of voice. Those scientists with ready access to channels of communication were quickly and forcefully heard in the cacophony of an evolving global health crisis.

But it was not the voices of the most powerful that the world always needed to hear. As new variants of SARS-CoV-2 emerged in Brazil, South Africa, and India, for example, scientists and clinicians from those countries deserved greater attention—attention they rarely received.

Fourth, the question of meaning. Just because research was published quickly did not mean that science policy makers read and responded to that research appropriately or in a timely manner. There were many examples during the pandemic of failures in science policy making, despite the availability of high-quality research. If science does not have effective institutional means for interpreting new findings, mistakes will be made.

And finally, dealing with error. Under severe pressure, miscalculations will be inevitable. The public and politicians should not think the worst of science or scientists if inadvertent errors are made. What matters is that those errors are identified and corrected as quickly as possible.

I hope the Confidence in Research initiative provokes actions across a diverse array of scientific institutions. But I am pessimistic. There is presently extraordinary complacency among many scientific bodies about the lessons of COVID-19. The attitude seems to be, “well, we developed effective vaccines in record time, didn’t we, so what is there to complain about?” It is an attitude that means we remain poorly prepared for coming health emergencies.

Confidence in research: researchers in the spotlight

Executive summary

Science and its practice are undergoing rapid change. The urgency of the pandemic accelerated open science and data sharing across borders, broadening access to research. Virtual collaborations amongst academic researchers and corporate R&D, as well as interdisciplinary and international collaboration helped to drive the extraordinary pace of innovation and breakthroughs. The pandemic also cemented the role of social media as a place for researchers to share their research, engage with others and debate findings. Much of this has been positive for science and academic research more broadly. But the experience of the last two years has also highlighted serious challenges facing the research community.

The huge quantities of information, increasingly publicised before peer review, poses challenges to identifying information that can be relied upon, even for seasoned researchers. This information must be synthesised and shared with the public, media, and policymakers, and researchers are increasingly the messengers. But what are the longer-term impacts of this? Are researchers prepared for this public-facing role? Are they equipped to communicate complex, often nuanced findings to lay audiences? And are they confident that the research community is providing them with support and incentive structures that are fit-for-purpose amidst this new landscape?

Our collective ability to tackle the most pressing global challenges, from climate change to future pandemics, depends on research, and on public trust in research. These challenges are monumental on their own, but amid the backdrop of increasing misinformation and politicisation of science, it is critical to understand whether researchers themselves have confidence in the research landscape, and in their abilities to take on this more public-facing role.

Confidence, as we define it, is two-fold: on the one hand, it relates to researchers' self-confidence, and whether they have confidence in the integrity of research, in research processes and outcomes, in their research skills, and in their careers as researchers. On the other, it accounts for the confidence that researchers have in their relationships with the wider research community, from funders and policymakers to the media, the public, corporations, publishers, and their universities...

Key findings:

The impacts of the pandemic: tackling inequality and misinformation

- :: Early career researcher, those in the Global South and, to a lesser extent, women respondents were more likely to feel the pandemic exacerbated inequalities in access to funding and resources.
- :: Misinformation was cited as a growing concern, with over two thirds of survey respondents saying that the pandemic increased the importance of separating good quality research from misinformation.
- :: Amidst these concerns, respondents still rely on peer review and methodological robustness when deciding whether to cite another piece of research.
- :: The pandemic may also be affecting how some researchers in our survey perceive their primary role in society.

Conducting research in public view: a more public-facing researcher

- :: Two thirds of researchers surveyed feel the pandemic has increased public attention on research, but less than 40% believe that better public understanding of how research is conducted will be a legacy of the pandemic.
- :: Public attention and concerns about misinformation may be leading surveyed researchers to adopt more careful research practices and rethink what topics they focus on.
- :: A more public-facing role for researchers comes with trade-offs: opportunities for public involvement, policy influence and improving social outcomes are coming up against oversimplification and politicisation of research.

Confidence boost: supporting researchers to take on a more public role

- :: Survey respondents think that personal connections are a greater determinant of whether research is used by policymakers<sup>2</sup> than the substance of the research itself.
- :: A third of respondents to our survey reported that they or a close colleague have experienced abusive or acrimonious communications when engaging online or on social media.
- :: Opportunities for policymaker engagement, communication support and incentive reforms appear important for reaping the benefits of increased public attention without undermining confidence in research.

Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Karim A.A. Khan KC, on NGO roundtable on crimes against children

Statement 15 November 2022

From 14-15 November 2022, my Office held a roundtable with national and international civil society organisations (CSOs) on crimes against and affecting children, at the seat of the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague. This is the first thematic roundtable in a broader initiative I launched in May 2022 to strengthen engagement with civil society.

This flagship event underlined that effective investigation and prosecution of crimes against and affecting children remains one of my key priorities. In my opening remarks, I underscored that “stronger capacity is necessary as children, like all other social groups, differ from each other in terms of age, gender, race, socio-economic status, and other conditions. Whilst all children suffer in war and will be harmed by virtually any violation of their rights, it is important to recognise the diversity of crimes committed and of children’s lived experiences, and the differential impact of armed violence based on their personal characteristics, including their gender and age.”

The event also provided an opportunity to discuss the Guidelines for Civil Society Organisations on documenting international crimes and human rights violations for accountability purposes, recently developed and launched by the ICC Prosecutor and Eurojust, with contributions from civil society organisations, national prosecutors, and international partners...

COP27: African ministers explore ways to scale up food production to feed the continent, bolster resilience

17-Nov-2022 - African agriculture ministers attending the United Nations climate summit in Egypt reiterated a commitment to work with development partners to unlock the continent's agriculture potential. During the special ministerial session, there was a strong consensus that Africa can feed itself if supported with green financing and climate-smart technology to boost agriculture productivity.

African Development Bank predicts economic slowdown in East Africa in 2022, but bounce back in 2023

16-Nov-2022 - The African Development Bank has released its latest East African Economic Outlook, predicting a slow recovery in the region in 2022 at 4.0 percent against 5.1% in 2021. The slowdown is due to the lingering effects of COVID-19; the adverse impacts of geopolitical tensions (notably the Russia-Ukraine conflict); climate change and devastating locust invasion, together with regional conflicts and tensions.

African Development Bank invests $20 million in private equity fund targeting renewable energy projects in sub-Saharan Africa

16-Nov-2022 - The Board of Directors of the African Development Bank Group today approved an equity investment of $20 million in Evolution Fund III, a pan-African clean and sustainable energy private equity fund that is mobilising about $400 million into renewable energy and resource-efficiency assets across sub-Saharan Africa over a 10-year period.

COP27: Germany commits €40 million to African Development Bank Group's Climate Action Window initiative for fragile African states

16-Nov-2022 - Germany has committed €40 million to the African Development Bank Group's Climate Action Window, German State Secretary for Economic Cooperation and Development Jochen Flasbarth has announced. The contribution is to support climate adaptation in fragile African states.

Aid to Ukraine Explained in Six Charts

November 18, 2022 | Mark F. Cancian

Six charts show where the $68 billion of U.S. aid to Ukraine goes, how much of it buys weapons, how long it will take to spend the money, and what other countries are doing. With no settlement in sight, the war will go on for many months, as will U.S. aid to support it.

The journal eLife recently announced a new scientific publishing model. Starting in January 2023, eLife will no longer make accept/reject decisions after peer review. This means that eLife authors – not editors – will decide whether and with what revisions an eLife article will be published. HHMI enthusiastically supports eLife's new model.

Global Fellows Network launches to make transformative change for children and families

Network features more than 1,100 leaders from around the world

Nov. 14, 2022

Today the W.K. Kellogg Foundation (WKKF) announced the launch of its Global Fellows Network (GFN), a community of change agents, thought leaders and influencers from more than 40 countries who are working to transform systems, policies and practices that create conditions for thriving children, working families and equitable communities.

The Global Fellows Network includes more than 1,100 leaders who are associated with signature WKKF fellowship programs – past and present — across the United States, Southern Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean. The network is the living legacy of WKKF Founder Will Keith Kellogg who said, "I'll invest my money in people."

"We need to empower and connect leaders who are acting boldly to support our children and families and those most impacted by the inequities in our communities," said La June Montgomery Tabron, president and CEO of the Kellogg Foundation. "Our children deserve to have leaders who look like them, who have similar lived experiences and who prioritize creating a pathway for their dreams to become their realities."

The Global Fellows Network will offer:

- Connection between members and with the foundation to share ideas, resources and inspiration.
- Collaboration and continuous learning, as well as the chance to engage in multi-generational and cross-cultural partnerships.
- Action—with and independent from WKKF—on important issues impacting communities around the world...

How Much Will It Cost?

An honest answer to the question, How much will it cost? is what most people seeking price transparency in health care tend to be after. Yet, what health care costs you or your family, or even being given an opportunity to assess whether you can afford services, is not how price transparency in health care is defined by even the most dedicated, knowledgeable advocates. A 2014 report from a landmark task force of the Healthcare Financial Management Association, for example, states that what all patients deserve from health care price transparency is "accurate price estimates from a reliable source." If this is the best definition of price transparency that a well-intentioned, well-informed task force suggests the American public can expect, one might reasonably suspect that, without dramatic reforms to financial structures of US health care, an honest answer to the question, How much will it cost? might not even be possible in many cases. This theme issue investigates why this problem matters clinically and ethically to every stakeholder, rich or poor, in the US health care system.

Anti-Trafficking Review is the first open access, peer reviewed journal dedicated to the issue of human trafficking. It explores trafficking in its broader context and intersections with gender, labour, and migration.

Special Issue – Migration, Sexuality, and Gender Identity

Over the past decade, there has been growing recognition of LGBTI+ people's specific experiences with migration, asylum, informal labour, exploitation, and community-building away from home.

This Special Issue of Anti-Trafficking Review contributes to this literature with new conceptual and empirical research from countries across Asia, Europe, Africa, and the Americas. In highlighting the fluidity of sexuality and gender identity, the issue also expands our understanding of how survival is waged in the worlds of migration and informal labour.

Forced Migration Review (FMR)

FMR 70 September 2022

<https://www.fmreview.org/issue70>

Knowledge, voice and power

People with lived experience of displacement need to be heard. Their perspectives, strategies and solutions should be at the centre of discussions about policy and practice. The authors in this issue reflect on progress made but also on the road still to travel. They challenge attitudes, highlight injustices and make practical recommendations for change.

We are very grateful to the Local Engagement Refugee Research Network (LERRN) for their partnership on this issue and for the generous financial support of both the International Development Research Centre of the Government of Canada and LERRN (funded by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC)).

Forced Migration Review issue 70 includes a major feature on 'Knowledge, voice and power' exploring issues of representation, influence, privilege, access, discrimination and more.

The issue also includes a feature on 'Social cohesion in refugee-hosting contexts', exploring the role of social cohesion in contexts of protracted displacement, with a particular focus on Kenya and Lebanon. It has been produced with the financial support of the Arts and Humanities Research Council, the Foreign, Commonwealth and Development Office, and the Jesuit Refugee Service.

Abstract

The nonclinical safety assessments for gene therapies are evolving, leveraging over 20 years of experimental and clinical experience. Despite the growing experience with these therapeutics, there are no approved harmonized global regulatory documents for developing gene therapies with only the ICH (International Council for Harmonization of Technical Requirements for Pharmaceuticals for Human Use) S12 guidance on nonclinical biodistribution currently under discussion. Several health authorities have issued guidance over the last 15 years on the nonclinical safety aspects for gene therapy products, but many of the recommendations are limited to high-level concepts on nonclinical safety aspects or altogether silent on key topics. Historically, this approach was appropriately vague given our relatively small dataset of nonclinical experience, where a comprehensive and detailed regulatory guidance approach was unlikely to be appropriate to address all scenarios. However, harmonization of key considerations and assumptions can provide a consistent basis for developing the appropriate nonclinical safety development plans for individual programs, reducing uncertainty across regulatory regions and unnecessary animal use. Several key areas of nonclinical safety testing are nearing maturation for a harmonized approach, including species selection, certain aspects of study design, study duration, and unintended genomic integration risks. Furthermore, several emerging topics are unaddressed in current regulatory guidance for gene therapy products, which will become key areas of differentiation for the next generation of therapeutics. These topics include redosing, juvenile/pediatric safety, and reproductive/developmental safety testing, where relevant experience from other modalities can be applied. The rationale and potential study design considerations for these topics will be proposed, acknowledging that certain aspects of gene therapy development are not considered appropriate for harmonization. This article provides an overview of the current nonclinical safety regulatory landscape, summarizes typical nonclinical safety study designs, highlights areas of uncertainty, and discusses emerging topics that warrant consideration. Specific recommendations and perspectives are provided to inform future regulatory discussions and harmonization efforts.

Scientists' Views on Scientific Self-Governance for Human Genome Editing Research

R. Jean Cadigan, et al.

Pages:1157–1163

Published Online:22 August 2022

<https://doi.org/10.1089/hum.2022.087>

Abstract

As research on human gene editing has grown, a variety of prominent international organizations are considering how best to govern such research. But what role do scientists engaged in genome editing think they should have in developing research governance? In this study, we present results from a survey of 212 U.S.-based scientists regarding views on human genome editing governance. Most did not believe that scientists should be allowed to self-govern human genome editing research. Open-ended responses revealed four main reasons: conflicts of interest, the inevitability of rare “bad apples,” historical evidence to the contrary, and the limitations of scientific expertise. Analyses of open-ended responses also revealed scientists' views on how human gene editing research should be governed. These views emphasize interdisciplinary professional and public input. The study results illustrate a noteworthy shift in the scientific community's traditional vision of professional autonomy and can inform ongoing efforts to develop research governance approaches.

Plugging the gap

A lack of data on economic outcomes hinders development and evaluation of public policy in many parts of the world. In this week's issue, Marshall Burke and his colleagues show how satellite imagery can be combined with machine learning to help plug this data gap. The researchers focused on the expansion of the electricity grid in Uganda. Using satellite imagery and local survey data on household wealth, the team trained a neural network to predict the economic outcomes for households throughout the country, including those that had recently been connected to the electricity grid. The results affirmed a positive causal link between electricity access and asset wealth in rural villages.

Significance

We took advantage of a unique experiment, in which anonymous donors gave US$10,000 to each of 200 recipients in seven countries. By comparing cash recipients with a control group that did not receive money, this preregistered experiment provides causal evidence that cash transfers substantially increase happiness across a diverse global sample. These gains were greatest for recipients who had the least: Those in lower-income countries gained three times more happiness than those in higher-income countries. Our data provide the clearest evidence to date that private citizens can improve net global happiness through voluntary redistribution to those with less.

Abstract

How much happiness could be gained if the world's wealth were distributed more equally? Despite decades of research investigating the relationship between money and happiness, no experimental work has quantified this effect for people across the global economic spectrum. We estimated the total gain in happiness generated when a pair of high-net-worth donors redistributed US$2 million of their wealth in $10,000 cash transfers to 200 people. Our preregistered analyses offer causal evidence that cash transfers substantially increase happiness among economically diverse individuals around the world. Recipients in lower-income countries exhibited happiness gains three times larger than those in higher-income countries. Still, the cash provided detectable benefits for people with household incomes up to $123,000.

BY Xiaojie Li, Yali Cong, Ruishuang Liu

Abstract

The Personal Information Protection Law (PIPL) that came into effect in the Peoples Republic of China (PRC) in November 2021 is in line with many international standards because it was designed by referring to jurisdictions of other nations, especially the provisions of the European Union (EU) General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR). Thus, the fundamental principles of the PIPL—such as lawfulness, fairness, transparency, accuracy, and purpose limitation—are now broadly in line with the GDPR. However, China has not used “academic derogation” or “academic exemptions” as have been used in European nations, the United States, and Australia to reconcile the protection of personal data rights with scientific research freedom in data processing (1). We provide here a general overview of the effect of the PIPL on ongoing and future transnational scientific research through a legal analysis of its provisions, and we suggest feasible solutions for challenges brought by the PIPL to transnational scientific research

Speaking of Toilets... A Chronicle Conversation with "Mr. Toilet", Jack Sim

Ahead of World Toilet Day (19 November), the UN Chronicle spoke with Jack Sim, Founder and Director of the World Toilet Organization. Mr. Sim, popularly known as "Mr. Toilet", discussed the important role of toilets and sanitation in achieving sustainable development; his work to improve sanitation systems throughout the world; and progress towards the goal of ensuring that everyone everywhere has access to a functioning toilet whenever needed.

Social and Behavioral Sciences Psychology Social Psychology

It is crucial to understand why people comply with measures to contain viruses and their effects during pandemics. We provide evidence from 35 countries (Ntotal = 12,553) from six continents during the COVID-19 pandemic that the social perception of key protagonists on two basic dimensions of social ...
